Slavery in England. Slavery survived in England much later than is generally supposed. The word bondage in Northumberland still means a female age in Northumbirland still means a female farm servant. The coolies and salters (i. c., sait miners) of East Lothian were actually slaves till 1775. If they deserted their service any one harboring them was liable to a penalty of f5 if he did not restore them in twenty-four hours. The last slave in England was not freed completely until 1799 and in 1842 there was a coolle living who, as well in 1842 there was a coolle living who, as well as him father and grandfather, had worked as his father and grandfather, as a slave in a pit at Musselburg.

Holt spoke with a quiet, almost flere-intensity. As he paused, Crane whistled in affectation of amused astonishment. He was astonished; but he was not amusid, and he was frightened. He had not even suspected Holt's affection for his wife. . "I came to you as my lawyer," he said, at length, "and as my friend. You are my lawyer, and—"

Crane hesitated, but Holt made no reply. He turned his back upon him, and Crane re-gaining his courage, went on. He knew that he had nothing more to lose, he had so utterly bitrayed himself. He felt that he might gain, even now, Holt's help, notwiths anding Holt's attitude and bitter words; at least he hoped that he might.

"After all, why can't you help me?" he pleaded. "There are other lawyers in plenty, I know, but you have always been mine. I know you; I trust you in spite of all you have now said. And—and, besides, you will look out for Marian's interests. Of course, I want to do the fair thing for Marian.

"How very kind you are!" Holt sneered.
"Yes, I do," Crane returned, "You know they have made this sort of thing easy. I have only to go to some western state, and it can all be managed without harm to any one. Don't force me to seek another lawyer. It will be so much better if you will help me Will you?"

Angry words rose to Holt's lips; but he repressed them. He was very tired; he had felt strongly and suffered keenly. I wish you would go," was all he said. "But will you help me," Crane persisted.
"I will do the best I can for Marian,"

me at your own home."

"As usual?" Crane asked.

"Yes, as usual." Holt returned, as, standing before the fire, he looked down upen Crane.

"I have just come from there. By the way, I think I may safely say you would be warmly welcomed there yourself. Mrs. Crane has really a very attractive and comfortable library. Have you seen it recently?" Holt answered, and then repeated, wearily "I wish you would go." Holt, left alone, did not find it easy to de-cide what would be best for Marian. He knew that Crane was willful and that to oppose him would but make him the more determined. He might, he felt, with the brary. Have you seen it recently?"
"Your sarcasm may be very good of its kind-very good." Crane responded, "but you "Your sarcasm may be very good of its kind—very good," Crane responded, "but you are making a very wasteful use of it. Marian was glad to see you, I have no doubt."

"I trust so. She was very agreeable; she always is. I did the best I could to make her unmindful of your absence."

"Indeed! Was that fair". And Crane forewarning now given him, successfully conduct Marian's cause, should Crane proceed in the way he proposed; but that would be a barren victory. Marian's happiness was at stake; and that could not be won by any action which should retain by her side, with the law's aid, an unloving husband. For many hours he debated with himself what was best to do, often walking to and fro in was best to do, often wasking to and fro in his small library, after eiting by the table with his hands supporting his tired head. The light of the lamp was paling before the new coming day, when at last he said to himself, "There is one way." He rose so quickly now that his chair was noisly upaet upon the floor; he crossed and recrossed the question now that, whatever Holt's mood, all of his judgment and energy and professional skill would be placed as loyally at his servroom impatiently, as though he felt himself confined, imprisoned. His face was worn and haggard; it bore evidence of his long response. "Trouble comes to all of us; but it seems to me you seek it. I have tried to point to you your danger, but you would not heed. I have tried to remonstrate with you, but you have resented my interference.

You were bound to go your own way, whether it should lead to destruction or not. Of way. The lamp on the table in the Crane's course you are in trouble. Now, who is the woman?"

"On one side of the table Marian was occupied with her sowing. Upon the other side Crane, with the evening poper in his hands, sat in a comfortable chair, his slippered feet upon a foot-"Certainly," Holt answered. "You are much like other men. first column of the first page is the name of a widow. There are seven widows listed in the first full column. It is not unusual to find them scattered through the directory in groups of four or five, one bame following another. There are but three names statered in the St. Louis directory under the letter X; of these three, one is the name of a widow.

Inquiry, as far as practical, developed that $.600 of these wearers of mourning apparel are willing to venture again in the matrimonial harness; 2,500, 50t. Louis widows think themselves too old to marry again, and the balance, 2,500, some of whom are bright and extremely handsome, will not be caught, they positively assert, in the net a second time. It is much in evidence that St. Louis has a larger percentage of attractive widows than any other large city in the union. New York, with its immense population, is said to have only 19,550 widows.

Another fact that has established itself, and one which is complimentary to St. Louis marriageable men, is that a majority of these women in mourning were not wildowed in this city. They came here to live after their hereavements.

The conversation of two women in mourning, passengers in a suburban ear, attracted my attention. "Rend," said one of them, who had three books in her hand; "I read all the ilme, and lust revel in books. When I had to live in that poking country town, when they will not a suburban can all I please." That's just the reason here when my husband died. Now I ream't know any one, and have nobody to tell me what to do. I can go walking or riding or to the theater, or where I please, and always find something to divert me."

Half an hour later I saw these women in mourning standing in front of the box office at one of the fashionable theaters in the city. It was mather by box with the matri
